All applicants refused international protection have a right to appeal to the International Protection Appeals Tribunal \(IPAT\) \(https://www.protectionappeals.ie/\) a statutorily independent body, which must then consider if the International Protection Office (IPO) determinations should be upheld or overturned.

Where IPAT upholds a determination to refuse international protection, and if permission to remain has also been refused by the IPO, the applicant can then seek a formal permission to remain review by the Minister for Justice.

This will be considered in cases where a person's circumstances may have changed in a material way since the initial decision was made to refuse permission to remain.
